to recommend its removal, what difference it might make on a practical basis, and I think we would very much appreciate, Dr. Zimmerman, if you would give us a down to earth explanation of it in practice.

DR. DAVID W. ZIMMERMAN: Madam Chairlady, members of the Committee, you put me on as an expert and you almost disqualify me, because I am not an expert. I have been working in the State Department of Education since 1942, and spent quite a spell in working with finance.

At the outset, I would like to say that I subscribe to the position of the Committee on keeping the Constitution brief, terse and to the point and not getting it fouled up with a lot of minutia which rightfully belongs in the law. I think constitutions are supposed to set the basic framework for the establishment of government, protection of rights and safeguards, and commit the other things to be in the statutes.

Just a footnote to what Dr. Pullen was saying about the tendency toward one-man government. We have experienced this kind of problem through the years.
